

View this email in your browser

WFSJ launches a definitive directory of science journalists

The popularity of the WFSJ's Press Card program has set the stage for one of the organization's most ambitious projects — an exclusive listing of science journalists who belong to our member associations. The information obtained through each application is being converted into a searchable directory in a protected area of the WFSJ Web site, which will be accessible in early September only to those individuals who have already been approved to receive Press Cards.

SubscribePast IssuesTranslate ▼

This new resource has been created in collaboration with the developer of the WFSJ Web site, with the protection of members' privacy as a fundamental priority. In this way, science journalists from around the world will have the option to identify themselves and each other in a safe, secure setting. In addition, the WFSJ will be able to provide these members with additional services, such as exclusive access to publishers or research organizations for job opportunities or detailed information that would not otherwise be available on-line.

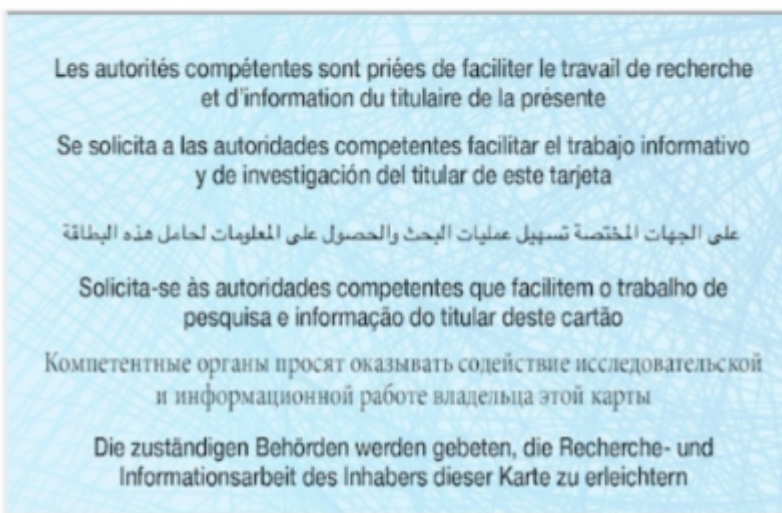

With the launch of this directory, there will be a pilot period of at least three months to ensure that it is functioning properly and participants are satisfied with the results. The WFSJ will be ready to collect feedback from users and make whatever changes are recommended. And once this database is completely up and running, an even more ambitious project will be set in motion — the WFSJ's first moderated discussion group. This interactive site will be linked to the directory and accessible only to those members, who will be able to exchange ideas and news amongst themselves. It will, in fact, be a setting for science journalists to stay in touch with their peers around the world.

We look forward to inviting you to join us as we take this next important step in the life of the WFSJ, it moves into its third decade of global service.

Subscribe

Past Issues

Translate ▼

Apply Now

Copyright © 2022 WFSJ, All rights reserved.

Want to change how you receive these emails?
You can update your preferences or unsubscribe from this list.

